

Vote Near on Adding Park Land in City

It's a turning point for a big piece of La Crosse land this week. The city council votes on whether to turn 160 acres of blufftop conservation land into a city park. If they make that decision, the land is forever off limits to development. But it stays a unique recreational tourist draw, argues outdoor activist and businessman, Marvin Wanders. And that's money in the bank for the city

The city purchased the land from the UW system nearly fifty years ago with the understanding it would always be accessible to the public.
