

The people looking to help turtles across the road in La Crosse are much more varied this time around. Last year, it was seniors at a couple of assisted living centers on the southside who wanted the city to put up turtle crossing signs along East Avenue. The effort failed. Now a nearby daycare has gotten into the act. Sherry Skelton's the director there. She's turned into a sort-of turtle behavioral specialist on their road-crossing habits

Employees at nearby Dairyland power have also signed onto a petition to squeeze some turtle crossing signs out of the city.
