

If you're not seeing many mosquitoes in the La Crosse area this summer, you might thank the county's vector control workers...

Dave Geske with the county health department says his crew spent time early this year, trying to limit the mosquito hatch in the La Crosse River marsh. Geske says mosquitoes were breeding 'tremendously' a few months ago, but bacteria treatments apparently worked to reduce the number of live mosquitoes we're seeing now.