This spring will likely be decision time for the Forest Hills clubhouse in La Crosse. The city's doing an evaluation of the building to see if it's salvageable for renovation or should get torn down. The first steps of that process are underway

Steve Carlyon is the city's park, rec and forestry boss. He figures remaining asbestos abatement now at just a few thousand dollars. It's clear that he would prefer to restore the century old building to retain a link to the course's past. But replacing might turn out to be way more cost-effective.
