

Long range planning can sometimes take a long time to get done. Kind of like the planning that the La Crosse school district is tackling regarding the future of its school buildings. The school board is months into the review of a proposed long range plan. A complicated process, says school board member Steve Kopp, because some of the key issues facing the district in the long run don't have solutions yet. While long range plans were back on the school board's agenda this week, the board skipped over the topic to deal with more pressing concerns. Like a whole bunch of teacher assistant layoffs.
